Today we test the iNetOffice online word processor, which claims that iNetWord is the only fully functioning online editor. In support of this claim, there are a long list of features that goes beyond what Microsoft Word can do. Prominent among its features are the sizing of text at the level of points and guidelines, document templates, grammatical control, custom paragraph styles, and web page templates, and a full-fledged revisions feature. And it's true that none of the online word processors we've reviewed previously include these.iNetOffice started working on Ajax-based iNetWord in 2003, when browser-based applications were in their childhood. the company's president, tom snyder, states that ajax combines six technologies «HTML, css, http, javascript, the document object model (dom) and a server-side platform» and that finding developers sufficiently experienced in all six is a challenge. Another great challenge is getting all this to work in multiple browsers. some programsThis requires a single browser flavor, such as ajaxWrite, which only works with Firefox 1.5 or later. iNetWord works fine in Internet Explorer and Firefox, but it doesn't seem to work in Opera. The company also intends for other web applications to integrate iNetWord, and offers a JavaScript client API for that purpose. They also have an Application Mashup video explaining how this integration works. The NetWord is serious about getting beta testers for the product. They are giving away WiFi detectors to anyone who gives them valuable feedback in the form of bug reports or feature requests. You won't win any WiFi detector here, but you might leave with reasons to try this interesting processor online. Go on... Its meaning à which is to convey the agreement, recognition and approval with enthusiasm à gives us a pause to think And our word? In fact, when it comes to communicating who we are, all we have is our word. So, what power do we give him? What placement? How do we deliver our word through our companies? Our challenge is to find the best ways to express and transmit our message in our "voice", while making sense, keeping us visible, and creating value among those with whom we share our words. See the newsletter as a tool to achieve this goal. Increasingly in our work/life we see the need for relationship-building, networking, news sharing, and community building. Companies coming from sole ownership to established companies are using newsletters as a marketing tool to achieve those ends. Newsletters also works to get employees, distributors, sales representatives, and news media enthusiastic about your service or brand. Add to it the fact that newsletters are easily forwarded and archived, interactive, and have a variable low cost. Done right, newsletters are a perfect and inexpensive way to market your business. Granted, cutting out the time to create a newsletter can seem difficult and the actual task of writing them can seem daunting. So don't go alone - look at the experts. When you decide to cultivate customers through a newsletter you are about to follow, the seed you plant will sprout and its value will blossom in your customers' response. In these times when mega-marketing budgets are scarce, the newsletter has become the small engine that could, chugging forward, build credibility, gaining trust and carrying the goodwill of your word, as well as the related information your customers will appreciate. Think of your newsletter as a form of networking. When recipients choose to share it with their colleagues and friends, the viral chain begins by leading to expanding your customer base and increased referrals. The key must keep it both succinct and useful by sharing concise tips, industry updates and thumbnails, quick tips, and more wisdom. Let your newsletter speak for you.
