Learn the AlphabetHopefully, youre already aware that Russian uses the Cyrillic alphabet, not the Roman alphabet.Be sure to learn the 33 letters of the Russian alphabet and the corresponding pronunciations. To a large extent, Russian sounds the way its spelled, so you can see words written and sound them out if you know how the individual letters are pronounced.2. Emphasize Listening and SpeakingLinguistic input is crucial, especially when starting a new language. Input-based learners may attempt to immerse themselves in a language by reading, practicing with flashcards, listening to music, watching movies or a host of other techniques.If your aim is to communicate with people, be sure youre training your ear. Dont hesitate to watch YouTube clips with vital words over and over again.By the same token, be sure youre speaking. Listen to a clip and then repeat it. Your mouth needs to become comfortable making the unfamiliar sounds common in Russian.Tutors are also invaluable resources. They can help you perfect your pronunciation to ensure youre well understood. They can also get you accustomed to the pace of speech.As with any language, some Russians speak quickly, mumble or run their words together. A tutor can help you get used to deconstructing what youre hearing.Getting into authentic Russian content is also important. As a beginner, this might get a bit overwhelming, so you might want to start with material aimed at children.Some programs make it a bit easier to sort media according to difficulty. FluentU, for example, has six learner levels in its virtual immersion program.3. Focus on Simple Sentences FirstYoure not going to be able to form complex grammatical sentences as soon as you learn the Cyrillic alphabet. As with learning any language, you need to start with basic constructions such as: . I want an apple. . I want a dog. . I want a boyfriend.As you learn new grammar concepts, your sentences will become longer and more complex, but its important to start small and build from there.4. Keep Formality in MindSimilar to French or Spanish, Russian uses two versions of the word you that differ based on formality. (you) is used in informal situations when speaking to an individual. (you) is used in two instances: when speaking to two or more people and when speaking to an individual in a formal manner.As a general rule, should really only be used when addressing children or close friends. The formal should be used any time youre speaking to strangers, acquaintances you dont know well, anyone older than you or someone in a position of authority.The list of basic Russian words and phrases above is far from comprehensive, but should help set you on track to start feeling comfortable speaking Russian from day one.If youre feeling up for it, you could even check out some more challenging words now to impress your Russian friends! !
